You can't job hunt in secret, except on job boards

When you post your resume on Internet job boards — and you must if you're looking for work — you may want to keep your name and contact information confidential.

If you don't care who knows you're job hunting, then don't worry about it. But if you're still working and want to job hunt without your current employer knowing about, then heed this advice.

Revi Goldwasser, founder of Interview Tips and Secrets in Boca Raton, Fla., said job hunters-on-the-sly need to pay attention to the "confidential" features permitted on major job boards such as CareerBuilder, HotJobs, and Monster.

"When you respond to a posting, there's a link to download your resume as a word attachment," she said in a telephone interview.

"Be sure you haven't named your resume file as your name if you're trying to be confidential. Change your resume file name to 'confidential resume' before you download it. Otherwise, even if you use the confidential features on the job board, employers will see your name."

And that's okay, of course, if you're in an open job search. But if you're not, then also make sure the body of your resume doesn't reveal your current employer's name or any other identifying information that you're trying to protect by using confidential functions.

Goldwasser was a goldmine of job board advice, starting with her encouragement to post your resume on as many major as well as niche job boards as relevant.

"Then refresh your posts weekly, even if it's just adding a comma," she said.

Goldwasser's other big tips for job-board postings:

* Be sure to use the key words in your resume that the job recruitment lists as requirements. That improves the odds of a computer or human screener tagging your resume for further consideration.

* Don't pay to have your resume posted anywhere. For almost every job, there are plenty of other free job board, niche site and individual company options to get noticed.

* Spend a Sunday afternoon and upload your resume to as many databases as possible. "It may pay dividends on Monday morning," she said.

It's true that most job hunters are landing jobs because of personal connections -- there's that "networking" buzzword again. But in an online world, it's just plain silly to not post appropriate resumes to jobs that are good fit.

Your company is probably searching for you

Submitted by Anonymous on July 21, 2009 - 5:33am.

I know that the company I work for (large finance/mutual fund company) actually has a department search every job board resume service every Monday with names against a list of their current employees. As a manager I have received e-mails when an employee has posted a resume publicly. Instead of giving the company line about what can we do to change things, I ask them how serious they are, offer any assistance and then tell them to use the confidential search options.

Free Financial Advice

BRB asks

Who do I talk to for financial advice that does not involve them trying to sell me something? We are 60 and 59, have a 200,000 annuity, are 60-70,000 credit card debt, have a house that is half paid for, own a condo in fl that is not paying for itself, have a good credit rating, not behind on anything, not facing foreclosure, wife on disability, husband still working, Want to pay off credit cards, but don't know how. Should we use part of annuity? I just want to know who to ask for help. Thanks
